Teaser	If goods are stopped by customs on suspicion of counterfeiting, you will be informed of this as the rights holder.
Volltext	If goods are suspected of infringing intellectual property rights, the customs authorities can detain them or suspend further clearance. This can prevent infringing goods from entering the internal market. As the rights holder, you can apply to the customs authorities for this procedure. If your application is approved and suspicious goods are found, customs will inform you of the detention and you can inspect the goods. This can be followed by various steps: • The goods will be destroyed under customs supervision if the necessary requirements are met. • The person or company that declared or owns the goods can object to the destruction. The customs authorities will then inform you of this. You can then initiate civil court proceedings to decide on the infringement. • If the infringement of property rights is not confirmed or you do not initiate civil court proceedings, the goods will continue to be cleared or released. Upon express request, you as the rights holder may also receive further information about • the name and address of the consignee, the

If civil proceedings have been initiated in good time, the goods will be stored by the customs authorities until a legally binding judgment has been issued. • In certain cases, you can request that samples or specimens of the confiscated goods be made available to you. • You will receive a notification informing you of the decision to destroy the goods. • Depending on the decision, the goods will be destroyed under customs supervision or released to the declaring or possessing person.
