Teaser	If your goods are stopped on suspicion of counterfeiting, customs will inform you of the next steps.
Volltext	If goods are suspected of infringing intellectual property rights, the customs authorities can detain them at the border or suspend further clearance. This can prevent infringing goods from entering the internal market. The holder of these rights can apply to the customs authorities for this procedure. If authorization has been granted and suspicious goods are found, customs will inform you as part of the customs clearance procedure. The rights holder can inspect the goods. This can be followed by various steps: • The goods will be destroyed under customs supervision if the necessary requirements are met. If the goods are in your possession or you have declared them, you can consent to their destruction. Your consent is also deemed to have been given if you do not object to the destruction within the deadline. • If you object to the destruction, the rights holder must initiate civil court proceedings to decide on the infringement. • If the infringement is not confirmed or the rights holder has not initiated civil court proceedings, the goods will continue to be processed or handed over.

In this case, the goods will be held by the customs authorities until a decision has been made on the suspected infringement. • You will receive a notification informing you of the decision to destroy the goods. • Depending on the decision, the goods will be destroyed or released under customs supervision.
