Sachverhalt

If, for example, you wish to work in a regulated profession in Berlin, as a master craftsman, you will already have obtained the necessary permits and qualifications in your home country and can provide evidence of this. You do not need to obtain any authorisations or permits, but simply report your activity to the same authority that would also be responsible for the recognition of your professional qualification. Which authority this is depends on where you intend to provide your services.

Non-regulated professions

If you wish to offer a service in Germany in a non-regulated profession, you may pursue your self-employed activity without prior notification to the competent body. For non-regulated professions, access to, or the exercising of the profession is not subject to any specific national qualification requirements. This means the profession can be exercised without any national accreditation.

However, this does not apply for services in fields that are excluded from the European Services Directive, such as healthcare, financial services, taxation, transport and gambling. Authorisations and permits are required from the competent authorities in order to pursue a self-employed profession in these fields.

Requirement for the establishment of a subsidiary

Depending on how often, how long and how regularly you would like to provide the services, in some cases cross-border provision of services may not be possible. Instead a new company or subsidiary must be established in that country.

In principle, you are permitted to establish a subsidiary under the same conditions as nationals of that country.

The competent authority is the trade office or chamber of commerce in the place where the service is to be provided.
