Teaser	Building charges are declarations of obligation under public law with which the respective property owners undertake to do, tolerate or refrain from doing something on their property.
Volltext	As a prospective builder, you cannot always meet the legal requirements for a building project on your own property - for example, when it comes to creating the necessary supply and disposal lines, parking spaces, access, passage to your own property or compliance with the clearance areas. By registering a so-called building obligation on another - usually neighboring - property, the eligibility for approval of a certain construction project can nevertheless be established. A building charge is an obligation under public law that an owner (or also the hereditary building or usufructuary) of a property enters into vis-à-vis the building inspectorate in favor of the building project of a third party - usually a neighbor. By registering a building obligation, the owner of the encumbered property permanently assumes the obligation to do, tolerate or refrain from doing certain things. For a building encumbrance to become effective, it must be entered in the so-called building encumbrance register. The building charge is binding for all legal successors.
