| Volltext                 | All wild animals living in Germany are basicallyownerless, i.e. they do not belong to anyone. However,every landowner is in principle entitled to the so-calledhunting right on his land. The right to hunt is theexclusive right to keep, hunt and appropriate wildanimals subject to hunting law in a given area. The rightof appropriation means, among other things, the rightto use and sell the meat, but also the collection ofthrowing poles and bird eggs. Anyone who unjustifiablyappropriates wild animals or parts of them is liable toprosecution. A distinction must be made between theright to hunt and the right to hunt. Only the right tohunt makes it possible to exercise the right to hunt andto hunt. The right to hunt may only be exercised by itsholder if he holds a hunting licence and is the owner ofcontiguous land with agricultural, forestry or fishinguse of more than 75 ha (private hunting district). Inaddition to the private hunting districts, there are jointhunting districts from a minimum size of 200 ha, inwhich the hunting association has the right to hunt.The hunting cassociation consists of the owners of theland belonging to a common hunting district on whichhunting can be carried out. As a rule, the huntingassociation uses hunting by leasing the right to hunt.The right to hunt is also associated with the obligationto conserve. The aim of the conservancy is to preservea species-rich and healthy wild population adapted tothe landscape and cultural conditions as well as tomaintain and secure its livelihoods. Hunting andconservation shall be carried out in such a way that:• the diversity of wildlife is preserved. All occurringspecies have a sufficient habitat available. Endangeredanimal and plant species are protected and promoted.• the habitat of the game is promoted and protectedagainst impairment, |

|                                 | <ul> <li>the game population is adapted to the possibilitiesand limits of the habitat and hunting is carried out insuch a way that no avoidable pain or suffering isinflicted on the game.</li> <li>all stipulations are made in such a way that acompatible coexistence of field, forest and game and acorresponding balance of interests take place.Inaddition to game density, increased game damage canoccur as a result of constant disturbances caused byrecreational traffic, tourism, sporting activities andimproper hunting. The factor of rest is therefore ofdecisive importance for the reduction of damage.Therefore, certain areas can be declared wildlife restzones.</li> </ul> |
