Sachverhalt

you want to join forces with other owners of a private forest, you can set up a forest management association.

In such an association, you can improve your economic success and contribute to the protection of the environment.

You also have the opportunity to receive subsidies for your recognized forestry association.

Forestry cooperatives are associations under private law, for example an association or a limited company.

The basic requirement for the recognition of a forestry association is

It must enable a significant improvement in management in terms of the size, location and connection of all member plots.

In addition, there are further requirements for the articles of association or partnership agreement, governing bodies and decision-making.

Your forest management association must fulfill at least one of the following tasks:

- Coordination of business plans and individual forestry projects;
- Coordination of projects and sales of timber or other forest products;
- Implementation of forest cultivation, soil improvement and stand maintenance work, including forest protection;
- Construction and maintenance of roads;
- Carrying out logging, timber processing and timber harvesting;
- Procurement and use of machinery and equipment for the aforementioned measures.

Many forest management associations also take on other tasks such as consulting, joint timber marketing, joint material purchasing, applying for subsidies and forest management.

First of all, you should discuss with other forest owners what your goals are and what tasks you want to perform. You can then clarify the organizational form and the legal form. Here you should seek advice from your forestry authority.

In contrast to forest management associations, forest cooperatives and forest management cooperatives are corporations under public law and are subject to state supervision.
