Teaser	If you are temporarily unable to continue your household due to illness or other circumstances and no other person in the household can do so, you can apply for help to continue your household.
Volltext	If you are temporarily unable to continue your household due to an emergency situation - whether because of illness, imprisonment, recreational measures or even after a death - and no other person in the household can take over this either, you can apply for help to continue the household from the social welfare institution responsible for you. You can receive help if it is necessary and reasonable to continue the household, for example, because you have to take care of children. Within the framework of help to continue the household, you can receive support for all activities that you can no longer manage, at least in part. This includes household chores as well as personal care for children and other family members living in the household. Assistance to continue the household is a social benefit based on your income and assets. It is only provided if you do not receive the required benefit from others or from providers of other social benefits, such as benefits from the statutory health insurance fund, assistance with care or education. As a rule, help to continue the household is only intended to support you temporarily. You can therefore only apply for it for a transitional period. This restriction does not apply if the assistance can avoid or postpone placement in an inpatient facility.
