Volltext	If you want to use forest land for other purposes, you need permission to convert forest from the responsible forestry authority. You also need this permit if you want to use the forest area primarily for non-forestry purposes or if you want to convert the forest only temporarily for other purposes. In the application, you must describe the planned project in detail and justify its site-specific nature. In the approval procedure, your interests are weighed against and among the interests of the general public. The competent authority will not approve the forest conversion if it is incompatible with the objectives of the forestry master plan or if the conservation of the forest is predominantly in the public interest. With the approval for forest conversion, the forestry authority determines measures to compensate for the negative impacts. When applying for permanent forest conversion, you should have a nearby area of comparable size suitable for afforestation and be able to prove this. A permit for initial afforestation from the lower agricultural authority must already exist for this. In the case of approval of a temporary forest conversion, the forestry authority sets an appropriate time limit for reforestation of the area after completion of the forest conversion. Further conditions and requirements may also be imposed. The competent authority shall set a reasonable time limit for the implementation of the forest conversion. Upon expiry of the deadline, the authorisation shall expire.
