Teaser	With a care directive, anyone can specify in advance who the court should appoint as a caregiver if legal care is no longer possible.
Volltext	If you require a guardian to manage your affairs, the court will also hear you as part of the guardianship proceedings on the question of who you would like as your guardian. If you are no longer able to express yourself, the court must take into account any wishes you have previously expressed. In this case, you can make a written advance care directive, also known as a "care directive". In it, you can specify who should be your guardian. You can also specify who should not be considered as a caregiver under any circumstances. In addition to any wishes regarding the person who should be your guardian, you also have the option of specifying further requirements for a later care case in a care directive. For example, you can make instructions on the following questions: • Do I want to maintain my standard of living in the event of care? Should my assets be used up if necessary? • Do I want to live in a particular home if I have to go into care? • Who would I like to be looked after by in the event of needing care? These are just suggestions. Your individual situation is decisive.

Sachverhalt

Note:

For reasons of proof, the care directive should be drawn up in writing and signed by you with the place and date.

Anyone who has a care directive written by another person is obliged to hand it over to the care court after becoming aware of the initiation of proceedings for the appointment of a caregiver. Advance care directives can be registered with the Central Register of Advance Care Directives of the Federal Chamber of Notaries for a small fee
