The services are individually tailored.

You will receive integration assistance services if you do not receive the necessary services from other social benefit or rehabilitation providers, for example the health insurance fund, pension insurance provider, employment agency or accident insurance provider.

The costs for the services are borne by the responsible integration assistance provider. The federal states determine who is responsible for integration assistance.

In principle, you must pay a contribution from your income and from your assets if they exceed a set limit. The income and assets of the person with disabilities receiving benefits and, in the case of minors entitled to benefits, of their parents, are relevant. Some benefits are exempt from contributions, for example curative education benefits, assistance with school education and benefits for social participation for beneficiaries who have not yet started school.
