civic duties required for the issuance of the national passport, and

- pay the fees set for it in the country of origin.

It would not be reasonable, for example, for you to enjoy asylum in Germany as a politically persecuted person and therefore not be able to visit the embassy of your country of origin. High costs for obtaining a passport in the country of origin do not make it fundamentally unreasonable to obtain a passport.

When applying for a travel document for foreigners, you should be able to provide proof of your previous efforts to obtain a passport.

In the case of only temporary passportlessness, the issuance of a travel document for foreigners can only be considered if compelling reasons require it.

In addition to the unreasonableness of obtaining a passport, another prerequisite is that

- Your stay in Germany is lawful, i.e. You are either already in possession of a residence permit (residence permit, settlement permit, permanent residence permit) or should receive it together with your travel document.
- They should be able to leave the federal territory permanently.
- you are in the asylum procedure and there is an urgent public interest in the issuance of the travel document, or compelling reasons require the issuance of the travel document, or the refusal of the travel document would constitute undue hardship and the implementation of the asylum procedure is not jeopardised.

The Foreigners' Registration Office may determine that the travel document should only be valid for certain countries or continents.

If the country of origin refuses to issue a passport or passport substitute for reasons that also exist in German passport law, no travel document can be
