Teaser	Foreign nationals from non-EU countries who are legally resident in Germany on a long-term basis and who have integrated both economically and socially can, under certain conditions, obtain an EU permanent residence permit.
Volltext	The EU permanent residence permit is an unlimited residence title and serves to consolidate a foreigner's residence in Germany. It entitles the holder to work as an employee or to pursue self-employment in Germany. In this respect, the EU long-term residence permit is equivalent to a "national" settlement permit (see "Related topics"). On the other hand, the EU permanent residence permit is also the basis for obtaining a right of residence and permission to take up employment in another EU Member State under simplified conditions. In this way, a third-country national also obtains a certain degree of freedom of movement within the European Union. The holder of a "national" settlement permit, on the other hand, can only make use of the so-called Schengen freedom of movement in the member states of the European Union (stay only for visiting purposes for a maximum of 90 days per 180-day period).

The conditions for issuing the permit are essentially the same as for the "national" settlement permit (see "Related topics"). However, there are stricter requirements than for the "national" settlement permit, for example with regard to securing the livelihood of the foreigner and their dependants, whom they must support.

Exceptions to the granting of an EU permanent residence permit are

- Holders of some residence permits on humanitarian grounds, as well as foreigners who have applied for such a permit.
- Foreigners who have applied for humanitarian protection status in another member state, as long as a decision has not yet been made.
- Diplomats
- Persons staying in the territory for the purpose of study or vocational training.
